also won the Best Feature Film Award on National Integration. Just twenty years after Indian Independence, not only were memories of pre-Partition India still raw and unblemished, but many associated with the freedom struggle were still alive. One such was Vidyavati, Bhagat Singh's mother. When it was announced that the illustrious awards ceremony in New Delhi would be attended by Indira Gandhi herself, Manoj Kumar's father hastened to Chandigarh in Punjab to collect Vidyavati so that she could attend the esteemed gathering of luminaries in the capital city. Recalling the event in 2014, Manoj Kumar said of Vidyavati that

> When she came on the dais, there was a standing ovation of a full 15 minutes. Madam Gandhi (Indira Gandhi) the then Prime Minister touched her feet to seek her blessings and we gave the entire prize money that came with the award to Vidyavatiji. We got tremendous love and affection from his mother. [13]

Of all the songs which featured in many a subsequent film on Bhagat Singh in the ensuing years, it is the songs of Shaheed which are still sung by devotees of Bhagat Singh. Songs such as 'Mera rang de basanti chola' have become a classic, as have 'Aye vatan ay vatan humko teri kasam' and 'Sarfaroshi ki tamanna'. The songs, 'Pagdi sambhal Jatta' and 'Watan pe marne wale zinda rahega tera naam' remain a rallying cry for revolution to this day.

After the Lyallpur incident of 22–23 March 1907, Denzil Ibbetson, the lieutenant-governor of Punjab, concluded that there was a secret plot to overthrow the British Government. His fears were not entirely baseless because 'the Arya Samaj, under the leadership of Ajit Singh and Lala Lajpat Rai, had succeeded in getting the rural population to suspend revenue payments', and if that was so, then 'the next step would be open revolt'. This is when Ibbetson moved to ban public meetings. Printing presses were seized. Individuals inciting zamindars not to pay revenue were to be arrested. Ajit Singh and Lajpat Rai, however, needed to be made examples of. So they were to be deported 'to strike terror into the minds of those concerned'. [14] The deportations, were carried out under Regulation III of the 1818 Bengal Regulations, because in the words of James Ker, 'it was
