It is impossible for Bhagat Singh not to have been impacted by this. Kishan Singh lived to see the day India became free but not long enough to enjoy this freedom. He died at Khatkar Kalan on 30 May 1951.

Ajit Singh, his younger brother, was no less affected by the aura of Kartar Singh Sarabha. He suffered prolonged political exile, first at the hands of the British in Mandalay Jail in Burma along with Lala Lajpat Rai. He then fled to South America for decades.

Swaran Singh died at home in Lahore after his release from prison in 1910. This was just three years after 1907, following the moment of Bhagat Singh's birth. Growing up in such family circumstances, Bhagat Singh himself was not immune to ideas of 'self-rule' and to take the fight for Independence to the British from a very early age. His upbringing was in an environment where the calls for expression of Indian patriotism abounded. This was as true outside the family as it was inside it.
