7

1917, Lahore

Kishan Singh fared better than either of his two younger brothers. He was the only one of Arjan Singh's sons to have had children—he and his wife, Vidyavati, had nine children. The first of these, Jagat Singh, did not survive infancy. The second, Bhagat Singh, did, only to be hanged, having barely reached adulthood. He was followed by his sister Amar Kaur and then two brothers, Kulbir Singh and Kultur Singh. His second and third sisters were Prakash Kaur and Shakuntla. After them came his youngest two brothers, Ranbir Singh and Rajendra Singh, a total of six sons and three daughters. Arjun Singh's Arya Samajist influence remained with the sons. While all three sisters married into Sikh households, the four surviving brothers all married as Arya Samajists. Bhagat Singh's mother Smitri Vidyavati (1886–1975) helped instil the Arya Samaj influence in Bhagat Singh's life. Though born a Sikh with the name 'Inder Kaur' (through which she assumed the nickname 'Indo'), her marriage to Kishan Singh in 1897 was according to the Arya Samaj tradition. Indeed, after marriage she assumed the name of 'Vidyavati' (the 'literate') although she was entirely uneducated. As a child bride, she did not join Kishan Singh in Banga Village until three years later in 1900, where she quickly became accustomed to running a household that served as a sanctuary and hideout for many a fugitive from British justice. [1] Her first child, Jagat Singh, was born to her four years later in 1904 but died a year later in 1905. With Kishan Singh away from home for long periods of time, and the presence of her two sisters-in-law, Harnam Kaur and Hukam Kaur, who were 'gasping in an emotional vacuum', it is said that she eked out her life in a manner that 'what was a struggle for her husband, was a "crisis" for her'. [2]