more than eight decades later, one can only wonder that how come no memorial was built to these martyrs in Lahore or in Lyallpur, the birthplace of Bhagat Singh and Sukhdev, which is now called Faisalabad in Pakistan'. The reason why this is so puzzling is, 'Bhagat Singh is the one and perhaps only symbol which evokes respect among both Indian and Pakistani people.' Indeed, in his words, 'Bhagat Singh is the common thread between the now-divided Punjabis – a symbol of resistance against colonialism and imperialism.' His enduring importance today is such that '[h]e can still become a common symbol of resistance against the new colonial corporate regime as well'.[13]
