. Badauni writes that Akbar moved against Bairam ‘because he had not absolute power in his own kingdom, and sometimes had no voice in some of the transactions relating to expenses of the Exchequer, and because there was no privy purse at all, and the servants of the Emperor had but poor fiefs, and were kept in the depths of poverty, while the Khan Khanan’s were in ease and luxury’.

. In fact, Abul Fazl never mentions Abul Qasim again, although Kamran’s son would live on for many years, and with him would live his claim to the throne. If, after all, Humayun could claim Kabul, Abul Qasim could certainly claim Delhi. One day, Akbar would put a swift and secret end to this possibility; for the moment, however, it’s unclear whether Akbar had thought about his cousin any more than Bairam had.

. Reported variously by Abul Fazl, Badauni and Nizamuddin.
. Badauni calls him a ‘paragon of greatness’, while Abul Fazl applauds the fact that ‘From his lack of bigotry and his broadmindedness he was called in India a Shia and in Persia a Sunni . . . the zealots of each sect used to censure him’. It is generally held, besides, that Abdul Latif’s unorthodox theological positions were among the early influences that inspired Akbar’s own future unorthodoxies.

. Badauni describes Ram Das as ‘a second Miyan Tan Sen’ and writes of how ‘the beauty of his voice continually brought tears to [Bairam Khan’s] eyes’. It may be that Akbar inherited some of his own love of music from his regent.
