. This was Abul Fazl's rank at the time of Badauni's writing; by the end of his career, Abul Fazl would be a 'panch-hazari', having attained a mansab of 5000, the highest possible rank for an amir under Akbar.

. 'As gardeners adorn gardens with trees,' writes Abul Fazl, 'and move them from one place to another, and reject many, and irrigate others, and labour to rear them to a proper size, and extirpate bad trees, and lop off evil branches, and remove trees that are too large, and graft some upon others . . . so do just and far-seeing kings light the lamp of wisdom by regulating and instructing their servants . . .' Or, as Iqtidar Alam Khan explains it in less flowery terms, 'Shortly after the suppression of the Uzbek revolt, the concentration of the officers belonging to the Atka Khail in the Punjab was also broken. From the account of Bayazid, it appears that Akbar was keenly conscious of the significance of this policy. To his mind the transfer of the Atka Khail from the Punjab was a greater achievement than the punishments meted out to Adham Khan.'
