. If Akbar was influenced by his Rajput kin and allies' investment of honour in their women, it is unclear if there was any reciprocal Central Asian influence on the Rajputs. Man Singh, for example, served in the Mughal court from the age of eleven; he was one of Akbar's greatest generals and his nephew by marriage, and also Jahangir's brother-in-law. Man Singh may have expanded the Mughal empire but he didn't absorb any of the Mughals' antipathy towards sati: when the Rajput amir died in 1614, sixty women burned with him. . The Fathers had begun to suspect that all Akbar's debates on religious matters were actually brainstorming sessions for a 'new religion with matter taken from all the existing systems' and they no longer wished to 'give him the pearls of the Gospel to tread and crush under his feet'.
