. Abul Fazl ascribes a very similar augury to Akbar, writing of how the emperor declared that Abdur Rahim, his protégé and khan-khanan, would have three sons. In fact, Abdur Rahim would have four, but Abul Fazl doesn't linger on the fact.

. Henry Beveridge argues that Inayatullah's addendum was most likely written during the reign of Salim's son, Khurram (titled Shahjahan), considering the 'animus shown' towards Salim. If so, Inayatullah and Shahjahan were treading a delicate path. Such was the force of the destiny that Abul Fazl had conjured for Akbar and his dynasty that Inayatullah would find himself papering over Salim's insubordination with the very 'veil' that once obscured Akbar's own light. Salim would, after all, inherit Akbar's throne; and so, Inayatullah would write: 'Though the action of the Prince outwardly appeared to be entirely alien from governing, yet God had special designs with regard to him so that by such conduct he should be selected for reigning.'
