A sketch of Akbar, c. 1602. Akbar did not want to die and was told that he would live several times the span of a normal life. But as he neared his sixties, the restless emperor was uneasy, whether he liked it or not. Artist unknown.

Akbar, Salim and Khusrau, c. 1602–04. Salim has brought his father a trained falcon, but Akbar is no longer the young boy who derived much joy from his hunts. Instead, he looks a bit bunched himself, trapped between the ambitions of his two remaining sons, Salim, and his favourite grandson, Khusrau (standing behind). Artist unknown.

Cleveland Museum of Art, Cleveland