A day later, on 21 April, a top 48-bedded private hospital in New Delhi (Sir Ganga Ram Hospital) had first flagged an SOS that they had about eight hours of oxygen remaining after which they would run out. This was followed by similar calls from other small and large hospitals in the area. Max Healthcare network of hospitals sought urgent intervention from the Delhi High Court after which the latter held a special hearing at 9.30 p.m. in which it reprimanded the Centre by saying, 'Beg, Borrow, Steal. It's your job to get oxygen.'[43] Sounds gut-wrenching, isn't it? The fact that the High Court had to step in and remind the Centre to provide oxygen which Delhi was asking for in the midst of a pandemic, was a story capable of tugging at the toughest heartstrings. However, to better understand the context, let us first understand what Delhi was asking for, whether that was a rational demand in itself to make during a raging second wave and if the Centre truly refused to supply the demanded quantity. The Centre had set up a real-time oxygen war room for monitoring movement and the supply of medical oxygen, which was essentially a virtual control room that the additional secretary-rank IAS officers from the DPIIT, Health, Home Affairs, Railways and Steel as well as dedicated officers from states/UTs were part of and monitored regularly. WhatsApp groups of officers from the DPIIT and dedicated senior IAS officers from states/UTs were also set up for ease of communication between the Centre and the states/UTs and for clarity on oxygen requirement, which was dynamic due to increase in the number of cases. These senior officers of the GoI and states/UTs shared information and problems for which immediate solutions were arrived at on a real-time basis, 24/7. Now, as of 15 April, Delhi had demanded 490 MT of oxygen, as evidenced by their communication on the aforementioned WhatsApp group and also placed on record in the Supreme Court. Within a couple of days, suddenly, they increased their demand to 700 MT. Taken by surprise, the additional secretary of the DPIIT spoke with the chief secretary of Delhi and they agreed that 100 MT, in addition to 490 MT, would be an agreeable extra, sufficient allocation.[44] However, despite that, Delhi continued to raise their demand of 700 MT in the High Court. Additional Secretary, DPIIT, Ms Dawra later confirmed on record in Court, 'I have not received any official message or call for more allocation [of oxygen] or message in [the] control room. They [the Delhi government] can ask for more and we can allocate more.'[45]
