come in the way. Even offer of tankers were rejected by Kejriwal government.'[53] Strangely, the next day, the Delhi government issued an ad in the newspapers stating that they were short of tankers!

This didn't stop here. Chief Minister Kejriwal wrote a letter to Union Minister Piyush Goyal stating that the output of a major oxygen supplier to Delhi, Inox Air Products, was being diverted to other states and that his government was in no position to look for and sign on a new supplier at this critical point in time.[54] Hawkish, bright and difficult, I believe Kejriwal is the sort of man who can start a fight in an empty room. However, the chief of Inox Air Products Siddharth Jain wrote a letter to the Centre stating that the trucks carrying oxygen were having to 'travel an additional distance of 100 kms from their unit in Modinagar, UP to reach hospitals in Delhi because thousands of protestors still stationed at Singhu and Ghazipur borders were blocking them.'[55] In fact, he even attested to his statement in the High Court during the oxygen crisis hearing, 'When my truck leaves, it is working like a milkman. Our trucks are diverted midway. Why would I not want to give oxygen? It is my business. Nobody has complained except for Delhi hospitals. I wonder why.'[56] The protestors blocking the oxygen tankers were the same guys who just a few months ago had vandalized the city on Republic Day. However, politicians quickly realized that if newsbreaks began to appear showing these protestors blocking critical life-saving oxygen supply, it would be the end of public sympathy and they wouldn't be able to milk the cause of the protesting farmers for any further political gain. So, almost on cue, the Delhi Police began to escort incoming tankers from UP and Haryana to the hospitals providing them a safe corridor and protection from the protesters.

As the wave ebbed, Siddharth Jain said, 'Unlike other states, Delhi was not arranging for logistics to call for the oxygen to the state, instead just complaining. It is not the union government's job to pick up the oxygen and deliver it to end locations. It is not their job to go to Odisha, pick up the oxygen and come to Mumbai and pour it in a tank. What do the states exist for? What is their job? It is the job of the state to go and organise the logistics and go and get the allocated product.'[57]

Meanwhile, several media channels busted a black-marketing racket in Delhi where a cylinder of oxygen was selling anywhere from ₹15,000–1 lakh. Oddly, the police either had no idea of this or were choosing to ignore
