> done a phenomenal job. They have moved Heaven and Earth to get the oxygen to the hospitals. Of course, a lot of people have suffered. But, then if the whole country is falling sick, there is no healthcare infrastructure in the world that can manage it.[82]

As we have seen earlier, the answers to some questions are better understood through counter-scenarios. It is no secret that for a number of days, the situation in the country was rather worrisome, despite a near ten-fold increase in oxygen supply and usage of all possible means of transportation for distribution. Could the GoI have done better? There always exists possibility of improvement. However, imagine a situation if all these efforts to augment production and distribution of oxygen were not taken in time. Each metric ton of oxygen saved innumerable lives. In retrospect, instant ramp up of oxygen by the GoI stood in stark contrast to Uttarakhand's tragic case where relief trucks did not leave for the destinations because top leaders of the Congress party could not find time to flag them off.
