In each of the last few days, India saw record after record shattered for the number of new cases logged, eclipsing everything at the worst of the outbreak. Today, on 1 May, India crossed a grave number of four lakh cases per day.[1] Many states had reinstituted curbs similar to those of last year's lockdown. People were once again placed under severe movement restrictions to control the spread of the contagion. The only difference being that introducing and lifting of restrictions remained each state's prerogative. This led to different states locking down at different times, with some allowing economic activities to function depending on the intensity of the caseload.

That being said, many cities and states were crumbling under the tsunami of the second wave. Their healthcare infrastructure had collapsed. Doctors from private hospitals were left to fend for themselves to arrange for drugs required for treatment. A doctor from a major private hospital in Mumbai, Dr J.P. attests that he and several other doctors from hospitals across the state had to repeatedly send out SOS messages to the opposition leader Devendra Fadnavis to make remdesivir and tocilizumab available for them because the state government was not able to cater to their supply. When Fadnavis did try to arrange from a manufacturer in Gujarat, the latter
