central leaders of the Congress believed that the independence of India would be delayed due to the stand of the political leadership of Assam (which then included most of today's Northeast—Arunachal Pradesh, Nagaland, Mizoram and Meghalaya).[3] If the usual means of information dissemination were to be activated, it would take at least a couple of weeks for information to pass down to the last mile. A televised address at prime time would be viewed by about 30–40 million people, social media activation would at best be seen by another 20–30 million from his 70 million Twitter and 46 million Facebook followers. That would still leave out over half of the country. The prime minister was also very aware that to effectively communicate with the people, he would have to develop a relationship of trust by stating facts in a language that every Indian could relate to, so that they could accept and follow the plan. He then suggested that they adopt a call to action which would involve asking people to come out to their balconies and doors and clap, play an instrument or even just bang together some vessels at a given time during the junta curfew. This call to action would be dedicated to the frontline and healthcare workers who were risking their lives by being on the call of duty, out of their homes to keep the rest of us safe. This would achieve multiple aims. First of all, hearing the clamour in the neighbourhood and experiencing the positive spirit, even the people who hadn't heard of the self-imposed curfew via messages in the media, would learn of it. This would be the power of 'one to many' exponential communication. Second, this would create an atmosphere of motivation and positivity when the entire country of 130 crore people was going to pass through uncharted territory, not knowing what lies ahead of them. And third, the prime minister knew that with rising cases, there would be a possibility of friction and altercation between people and healthcare workers. By reminding the society right in the beginning of our war against COVID-19 to be grateful to the healthcare workers, he tried to address this problem as well. So, it was settled then, the prime minister would make a televised address to the nation in the next few days asking folks to follow a self-imposed curfew and a day after that, he would announce a total countrywide lockdown.

The officials would use the few days between the meeting and the call to lockdown to streamline the supply of essential items. By this day, India had already expanded its network of labs to test COVID-19 to 52. The Ministry of Home Affairs had also guided the states and Union Territories
