killed. However, the arms supply had already been removed from the area so the British did not obtain what they came looking for. The British were forced to withdraw back to Boston. With over seventy British soldiers dead and 200 either missing or dead, it was the beginning of the American Revolution.

Until March of the following year, the British were forced to stay in Boston and were sent supplies by the British navy. However despite the extra supplies, the British had limited resources and only some knowledge of the landscape. In May, reinforcements from England arrived in Boston to help free the British but they proved to be futile. As a last resort, the British withdrew to Canada by using the ships they had at their disposal.

In May 1775, Congress assembled for another critical meeting. They discussed the need for a military that would protect America for centuries to come. The Commander in Chief was George Washington who tried to compromise with the British but King George III declined. In August of the same year, the king declared all colonies as rebel colonies and that they would be dealt with according to British Law. The Continental Congress ignored the statement and agreed that the American people needed their own government. As a result, the American colonies created their own state constitutions, which effectively replaced imperial laws.

Common Sense by Tom Paine was published the next year. The author suggested that Congress should not need to negotiate with Britain for anything. The book quickly became popular among the public for its independence ideas.

On June 7th 1776, the Continental Congress was issued a document by Richard Henry Lee that stated America should be completely independent. It further stated that Congress should forge relationships with other countries to fight Britain. Four days later, Congress selected a group to pen the Declaration of Independence which was signed on the fourth of July.