north and once again met McClellan on the battlefield at Antietam. This time, it was the southern army who were forced to withdraw.

On December 13, 1862, the Confederates secured a great victory over the Unionists at Fredericksburg and then again at Chancellorsville the following May. In the early summer of 1863, General Lee marched back to the north in preparation for the Battle of Gettysburg, which was the most decisive battle of the civil war. Between the first and third of July, the northern and southern armies fought each other viciously. Initially, the Confederates had the upper hand but they suffered heavy losses and had no choice but to withdraw. When they lost at Vicksburg, General Grant was there to seize the area. From this point onwards, the Confederate army began to decline. They made another attempt at Chattanooga in November of the same year but were defeated by the Unionists.

General Sherman marched down to Georgia, arrived in Atlanta in 1864 and captured Savannah before marching towards South Carolina. He was able to take control of Columbia in 1865 before pressing towards North Carolina.

The war came to an end when General Lee from the Confederates was overpowered by General Grant’s men. Initially, he had evacuated his forces from Richmond and Petersburg in April 1864. But when he saw there was no chance of winning, he surrendered to General Grant and ended the war. The remaining Confederate forces also surrendered to the Unionists by the end of May 1864. Unfortunately, President Lincoln did not live to see the conclusion of the civil war. He was murdered by John Wilkes Booth in the April of that year at Ford’s Theatre.
