The Arrival of New Australians

When World War II occurred, Australian women discovered that there were new job positions they could fill while the men were away fighting. Countless migrants from all around the world including the Middle East and the European continent arrived in the country when the war ended in 1945. The majority of these people found positions in the increasingly prosperous manufacturing industry.

Through the 1950s, the Australian economy thrived with great construction projects such as the famous Sydney Opera House and the Snow Mountains Hydroelectric Scheme. The country became abundant in various natural resources such as timber, wheat and metals. By the end of the 1960s, over 70% of the population owned their own homes.