spring and summer seasons so the ruling class used farmers to help build the planned architecture during the months of flooding.

The Ancient Egyptians believed in almost the same religion throughout their existence. They were polytheistic in nature and their religion was organized by powerful priests funded by the Pharaoh. The Pharaoh was considered to be God's second in command and controlled all political affairs of the people. Moreover, the Egyptians believed in the afterlife so they performed lengthy rituals to embalm the deceased in preparation for the afterlife. Only nobles were honored with these ceremonies because of the time and effort needed. They were placed in individual chambers inside large pyramids along with all of their possessions from the worldly life. These rituals eventually led to the construction of great pyramids and monuments that are famous even up until today.

The Egyptians had a stately society in which the great priest established all social and working relations by the permission of the Pharaoh. The Pharaoh was not only God's representative on Earth but also considered to be a priest and a king. He owned all of the land and chose to distribute it as he saw fit. The nobles, priests, members of the royal family and appointed ministers were free from the hard work that was reserved for the peasants and slaves. Children inherited the same social class as their parents so there was no possibility of changing class or moving up the hierarchy unless the Pharaoh made an exception. The lower class cultivated crops and were mostly employed in the construction of large monuments and pyramids. The upper class made significant contributions to the study of mathematics and writing, some of which are still used in the modern world today.
