the armed forces and their general Hamilcar Barca made some serious mistakes on the battlefield.

Consequently, the nobles negotiated amongst themselves and a republic was established. In 409 BC, the second Sicilian war occurred. By that time, Carthage had recovered from the first war and conquered new territories such as modern-day Tunisia and several other areas in northern Africa. Carthage wished to rule the island of Sicily so they attacked the region again in hopes of winning it back. The battle was constant and several times the fight swung in favor of Carthage, but the army was attacked by a series of plagues. For several years, the struggle for Sicily continued between the Greeks and the Phoenicians. The last Sicilian war occurred in 315 BC when the Tyrant of Syracuse attempted to take over the last Carthaginian territories remaining. The Carthaginian army fought back with all of their might but the Greeks ultimately took hold of the land and emerged as the victors. However, the Carthaginians still had pockets of land under their control.

The Pyrrhic war is another critical event that took place in this territory between 280 and 275 BC. The war was fought mainly against Pyrrhus, who was the king of Greece at the time. Pyrrhus was determined to fight until he had full control of the region because he wanted to stop the emerging power of the Roman Republic. Pyrrhus desired Sicily very much, so he fought in order to get the Carthaginians out of there entirely. However, the Pyrrhus campaigns were inconclusive so the situation remained as it had for Carthage.

Over the 3rd and 2nd century BC, this city was engaged in a series of wars with Rome often known as the Punic Wars. This succession of wars ended in 146 BC when Carthage finally fell and became a part of the Roman Empire. Then, the Roman Senate attempted to establish a colony on this particular site but failed until 29 BC when Augustus created the African government of the empire. Later on, Carthage grew prosperous and became very famous. In the middle of the 3rd century, the city started to decline. Although there were some small Jewish communities, the Carthaginian religion was based on the Phoenician religion, which meant majority of the
