The Western and Eastern Fronts

Within the first four weeks of the declaration of war, the frontlines saw strong attacks and quick movements by both sides. France and Belgium were both attacked initially by Germany while Austria-Hungary and Germany were attacked by Russia. Serbia was of course attacked by Austria-Hungary, since that is where the conflict had initiated. After the Battle of the Marne between the fifth and ninth of September 1914, the western frontlines were established at the center of France, where they would mostly stay during the passing of the next few years. In the eastern regions, the eastern frontline soon found a permanent border.
