The End of the War and the Armistice

In 1918, both sides initiated their ultimate strategies and last resorts to win the war, but neither side was successful. Germany lost a succession of battles against a tired Allied force and was forced to retreat. Influenza spread amongst both sides and killed many soldiers. Internal revolts broke out in both the German and Austrian-Hungarian governments.

Close to the end of 1918, the members of the Central Powers signed armistice agreements with Germany being the final country to do so. Austria-Hungary was divided into numerous countries and Germany was penalized for its part in the war. The ultimate blame was put on Germany by the other nations. There were limitations and sanctions set out in the Treaty of Versailles, which Germany was displeased with.
