Germany After the War

Looking back at this time, a number of historians agree that the punishments Germany faced in the Treaty of Versailles were far too strict. Instead of bringing peace back to Europe, the treaty is thought to be responsible for the Second World War. The German people felt embarrassed to discuss the war and were forced to pay reparations they could not afford. Although the nation only paid a fraction of what it was meant to pay, it caused a huge strain on economy. In the next few years, there was a building of friction between Germany and the other European countries. This friction allowed extreme groups like the Nazis to take advantage of the situation and the people in the coming years.
