Norwegian Campaign

The supply of iron metal from Sweden to Germany through the northern Norwegian port of Narvik was important to the German army. When the British found out, they decided to destroy the supply source. The Germans feared losing this resource and marched towards Narvik to secure it. On April 8th, 1940, when the British boats began laying mines off the Norwegian drift, Chamberlain crowed that Hitler had "missed the bus."

Be that as it may, the Germans progressed quickly into Scandinavia and drove Denmark to a fast surrender. Nonpartisan Norway was forced to fight but Norwegian ports tumbled to the Germans one after the other. The British reaction, albeit quick, was poorly planned. The troops had arrived in snowy Norway without skis and only a set of traveler maps. When Germany attacked Holland and Belgium on the 10th of May, the British evacuated Norway and travelled to the Low Countries. Norway eventually fell under German control and was given to the Norwegian Nazi Vidkun Quisling to hold.

After the Norwegian disaster, Chamberlain was expelled by the government. Not able to frame a coalition government, he was forced to leave in the midst of yelling from the House of Commons. Winston Churchill, the First Lord of the Admiralty, assumed responsibility in his place. On the same day of May 10th, Hitler unleashed quick assaults south of the Channel. After six months of leaving his post, Chamberlain died from cancer.