The Diem Regime

The new government under Diem became corrupted and the people began to hate him. America continued to help Diem because the communists were gaining influence in Southern Vietnam. The communist resistance that had developed was known as the Viet Cong. To help Diem, a number of military advisors were sent from America to Vietnam to train the South Vietnamese Army, which was known as ARVN. America's efforts proved to be in vain because of internal political issues surrounding Diem. The following year America offered support to an uprising, which toppled Diem from his position as Prime Minister.
