Quagmire and Attrition

The American army was having difficulty progressing into enemy territory. This began a process known as attrition, whereby they would try to smother the enemy through a wave of slow destruction that resulted in huge losses. The Viet Cong’s soldiers were clever because they knew the lay of the land and also used guerrilla tactics. Disheartened and annoyed, the Americans began using Agent Orange and napalm on the enemy but it did not provide the advantage they needed.
