emperor of the Roman Empire and went down in history as Julian the Apostate.

The next emperor was Jovian who brought back Christianity and annulled all of Julian's religious reforms. However, it was Theodosius I who took on the responsibility of leading the empire. He ruled between 379 and 395 CE, banned all pagan worship, transformed pagan temples into Christian churches and shut down educational centers. Indeed, it was Theodosius I who shut down Plato's Academy in Greece. While many Romans were Christian, the majority were still faithful to paganism. Because of this, the Roman aristocracies were not in favor of his reforms. Theodosius I devoted his time to the reestablishment of Christianity in the Roman Empire so much so that he ignored many of his responsibilities. He ended up becoming the final emperor to rule both halves of the empire.
