was drained from constant warfare and it was left severely weakened. At this time, the Islamic forces moved in and removed the Byzantine Empire from all regions except Anatolia. Since the Byzantine Empire found itself in a precarious position between the Avars and the Islamic forces, the Christian rulers looked towards taking back the Middle East. The rulers viewed the Middle East as the homeland of their Christian faith and ignored much of their responsibilities in the west.

Italy was divided up into various regions held by a number of tribes including the Lombards, who had formed an uneasy relationship with each other. France was divided between the Franks, Visigoths and the Burgundians before the establishment of the Merovingian dynasty. This dynasty was made up of Clovis and his heirs. These territories were further divided by their descendants who tried to gain as much power as possible. Internal fighting over thrones and armies assembled by force were just two reasons why the main government could simply not withstand the chaos. The provincial government controlled the outer areas with military forces. Because there were lots of power struggles happening between the rulers and their relatives, the guards of the palace were given strict orders to initiate a full lockout whenever a king died.

It was Pepin II who reunited the country by suppressing the rebels throughout the Merovingian territory. Charles Martel continued his father's work by taking control of the eastern regions and fighting the Islamic forces in 732 CE. Pepin III was the son of Charles Martel who overthrew the last Merovingian king with the backing of the Church. His reputation grew so much that he was also asked to defeat the Lombards in Italy who had created fear among the population. In 752, Pope Stephen II awarded Pepin III with the title Protector of the Romans. The Church was able to expand its powers through its priests in the outer regions and created Papal States during the 10th century.

His son Carlos Magnus reigned as Charlemagne from 768 to 814 CE and began the Carolingian dynasty. The headquarters were located in the center of modern day France. He was able to rally against the Saxons in the area known as Germany today. At this time, many converted to Catholicism. He
