Frederick II was Barbarossa's son and became the king of both Sicily and Germany in 1215 by marrying into the House of Norman. He had a reputation as a highly educated man but was opposed by both Italy and the Church. He had postponed the next Crusade the Church wanted to launch and effectively isolated himself as a result. In 1229, he finally began making his way to the Holy Land with his army. Surprisingly, he was able to take back the Holy Land through negotiation instead of fighting. Because he did not actually fight, Pope Innocent IV excommunicated him. Throughout the remainder of his rule, both Italy and the Church plotted against Frederick II. In 1244, Jerusalem came under western rule for the final time, since the Khwarazmshah armies were attacked by the Mongolians. In modern day Spain, the Castilian kings managed to control nearly two thirds of the country while sacrilegious activities in France diminished gradually.
