The February Revolution

In 1917, the Russian Revolution occurred, which is also known as the February Revolution. The Russians lost confidence in the leadership of Tsar Nicholas II and removed him from power. There was a succession of bloody demonstrations and uprisings at Petrograd, known today as St. Petersburg. The people were simply unhappy at the state of the economy and wished for change.

While Petrograd supported the February Revolution, the rest of the population may not have condoned the revolution. The new provisional regime that was installed was more democratic and interests of the locals were taken into consideration.
