of Kings” and supported Charles’ innovations in the Church. On the other hand, Charles had alienated many with his actions in the Thirty Years’ War. He had applied taxes that had left the citizens in despair. The Parliament felt that he had betrayed the Protestant Church. The ruling classes were effectively split down the middle and the stage was set for the first English Civil War.