marine surveyor. A final check was done to satisfy the requirements of the Board of Trade. R.L. Bewick, chief officer of the ship, in the absence of the captain, conducted a representative of the board around the vessel and provided the details asked for.[91]

It seems that the Gallia had to obtain another passenger certificate—for 1,344 passengers—in mid-May. (It is not clear why it had to get another certificate if that requirement had already been met in Bombay.) It arrived in Tuticorin on 16 May with four first-class, thirty-six second-class and 209 deck passengers along with cargo and some horses. Leaving for Colombo the same evening it was expected back in Tuticorin on 17th morning.[92]

Meanwhile, the arrival of the Lawoe was delayed as it was waiting for a fresh passenger certificate to be issued in Bombay.[93] As late as in mid-May, it was still reported that its 'survey has been almost completed'.[94] Contrary to the police's wishful belief that it would not arrive in Tuticorin until mid-June,[95] the survey passed the Lawoe with a class of 100 A1, and it sailed from Bombay on 3 June 1907,[96] arriving in Tuticorin via Colombo on 11 June.[97]
