One Sarangapani Aiyangar of Kumbakonam, described as an agent of SSNCo as well as a paid assistant of Somasundara Bharati, travelled to Guntur district where he succeeded in selling seventy-five shares; evidently, he was building on the spadework by Somasundara Bharati a few months earlier. On this canvassing tour, he boarded and lodged at the house of a local pleader—agents such as Sarangapani Aiyangar enjoyed the hospitality of patriotic people for SSNCo work.[111] (Similarly, Sadhu Ganapati Panthulu, on his visit to Salem in May to canvass shares, stayed at C. Vijayaraghavachari's home.[112] Mandayam S. Parthasarathy on his visit to Salem, stayed with B.V. Narasimhaiah.[113] People were evidently helping the Swadeshi company in their own little way.) Sarangapani Aiyangar was in Saidapet near Madras City soon on a similar effort but could sell only seven or eight shares: the CID police was elated that 'most of the people he approached refused to buy'.[114]

In Avudaiyarkoil in Thanjavur district, one Ramaswamy Aiyar used his position as temple trustee to coerce some families to contribute. Those who did not were prevented from offering pujas or participating in the temple festivals.[115] The fervent patriotism that SSNCo evoked is manifest in such instances.

Canvassing for shares extended up to Behrampur in Ganjam district (then a part of Madras Presidency; now in Odisha) where one Ramaswami Sastri spent a week canvassing; local pleaders responded by taking up a fair number of shares.[116]

While it was tough going for agents to find shareholders in an atmosphere of fear, this also had a counter-effect. The horror of a double life imprisonment for VOC, pronounced on 7 July, gave a fillip to the canvassing. The police estimated that, in the month following the draconian sentence, the company managed to raise Rs 35,000. The legal luminary, moderate leader and soon-to-be high court judge, V. Krishnaswamy's Aiyar's promise to invest Rs 20,000 was a bonus, though it never materialized.[117]
