At this time there was a curious sidelight. Ironically, even as VOC was struggling to meet the official liquidator's demands, a tower officer in Cannanore jail, misinformed that VOC had hoarded away 'one crore rupees' as 'proprietor' of SSNCo, tried to curry favours with VOC, acting 'like a whore'. Initially, VOC indulged him with small favours, but he put a stop to it when the demands grew. The incensed officer carried tales to higher officials and made prison life even more difficult for VOC.[85]

From her letters in November, we see that Meenakshi was still anxiously inquiring about the court proceedings.[86] A month or so later, on 24 December 1912, VOC was released from prison. Nothing is known of how the official liquidator closed the file. What we know for certain is that for the next quarter of a century, until his death in 1936, VOC was mired in debt.
