[1] Bharati, preface to Janma Bhoomi (Pondicherry, 1909).

[2] Sarkar, Swadeshi Movement in Bengal, p. 21, emphasis added. Sarkar's 1973-masterpiece was reissued by Permanent Black, Ranikhet in 2010 with a new preface by the author and two additional essays by Dipesh Chakrabarty and Neeladri Bhattacharya. I have, however, preferred to use my well-thumbed and underlined People's Publishing House edition!

[3] See Subramania Bharati, 'The Political Evolution in the Madras Presidency' for Madras's reputation as being 'benighted'. (Unpublished manuscript first published in Padmanabhan, ed., Bharati Puthaiyal Perumthirattu, p. 552). 'Madras was supposed to be a sleepy hollow', wrote the Mahratta (22-3-1908).

[4] Chandra, Rise and Growth of Economic Nationalism is littered with references to Subramania Iyer's book.

[5] For instance, while The Hindu's circulation rose to 4,000 copies from a more modest 1,700 in 1905, '[a] much more loyal paper', the Indian Patriot's circulation remained constant during this period. The CID attributed the increase in its circulation to its 'undoubtedly … anti-British tone and its systematic fault-finding with the administration.' Letter no. 886, Public & Confidential, 26-9-1910.

[6] Rajendran, in National Movement in Tamil Nadu, makes a weak case for the extent and strength of the movement. For a critical review, see Venkatachalapathy, 'Madras: Not Benighted?'

[7] Sarkar, Swadeshi Movement in Bengal.

[8] In October 1906, Arbuthnot and Company, a Madras-based British mercantile banking firm crashed due to fraud and mismanagement. More than 2,000 depositors lost their life savings, eroding confidence in the integrity and probity of British businessmen. The Arbuthnot crash provided much ideological ammunition to Swadeshi propaganda.

[9] Nevinson, New Spirit in India, pp. 122–23.

[10] Government Order (henceforth G.O.) no. 1201, Judicial, 4-7-1907. All G.O. references pertain to the proceedings of the Government of Madras (GoM).

[11] G.O. no. 863, Judicial, 20-6-1908.

[12] Seshadri, Swadeshi Bank from South India.