rates for Binnys and it is likely that they applied to the BI's Tuticorin Agents as well.

[59] House of Binny, p. 161.

[60] Ibid., p. 124.

[61] BISNCo. Intended Time Tables, 1907, p. 38, BIS/29/2. BISN Papers.

[62] This section is based on Pate, Madras District Gazetteers: Tinnevelly, pp. 212–14 and Raman, 'A Tale of Two Brothers'.

[63] Chapman's evidence in IOL: L/P&J/6/857.

[64] Arasaratnam, Maritime India in the Seventeenth Century, pp. 25–26.

[65] Pate, Madras District Gazetteer: Tinnevelly, pp. 446–47.

[66] Padmanabha Ayyar, Short Account of the Tinnevelly District, p. 14.

[67] Kumar, ed., Cambridge Economic History of India, vol. 2, p. 738.

[68] Marshall, Handbook of Directions to the Ports in the Presidency of Madras and Ceylon.

[69] Port of Tuticorin: A Gateway to South-East Asia, p. 4.

[70] Illustrated Guide to the South Indian Railway, p. 283.

[71] Brown, From Calcutta to Bombay Coasting, p. 56.

[72] Cotton, Handbook of Commercial Information of India, p. 56.

[73] Once, on the BI steamer Patiala, 137 of the 582 goats and sheep, accommodated in the bunker alleyways, died en route to Colombo. Remarking on this, the BI agent said, 'It is customary for these steamers to constantly carry as many goats and sheep as was [sic] carried on this occasion.' In investigating this particular tragedy, the government found that '[t]here are apparently no rules regarding the number of cattle which may be shipped in a given place on board ships.' G.O. no. 272–3, Marine, 5-9-1910.

[74] Report of the Deck Passenger Committee, vol. 1, p. 38.

[75] For Dharmanand Kosambi's experience at Tuticorin on his way to Colombo at the beginning of the century, see Kosambi, Nivedan, pp. 100–02.

[76] Report of the Deck Passenger Committee, vol. 1, p. 9. But this did little to weaken BI; it extended its monopoly over the Madras–Burma and Madras–Straits Settlement routes. Such was its influence that, when the Government of India constituted the Deck Passenger Committee in 1921,