food service organization, the process of recruitment for filling any position may be carried out through two sources. They are internal and external sources.

Recruitment Interview

Plate 7.1 Recruitment

Internal Source - The internal source of recruitment is within the working employees and is suitable for all positions in food service operations. Transfers from one unit or another within the same organization or promotion of existing staff, for E.g.: from assistant cook to chief cook is carried out. This method of recruitment is economical as it saves the advertising costs and the management knows about the employee. The employee in turn is well familiar with the organization.

External source - Advertisement as a source of external recruitment is a common method. Advertisements in newspapers, TV, local radio and business magazines, regarding specific vacancies and their eligibility are done, to reach a large group of potential applicants. Sometimes the food service organization maintains close liaison with colleges, in order to seek appropriate applicants.

7.1.1 Selection

After recruitment, the next step is selection of the qualified and competent candidates for the organization. Selection is defined as the process of choosing the best from among the prospective candidates applied for the particular job. Recruitment and selection are often used as synonymous and used interchangeably, as they are the two sides of same coin.

Table 7.1 Differences between recruitment and selection

S.no	Recruitment	Selection
1	Recruitment technically precedes selection	Selection follows recruitment
2.	It refers to the process of identifying and encouraging potential candidates to apply for jobs in the organization	It involves choosing the best out of those recruited.
3.	It is positive as it invites as much as applicants for wider choice and increasing the selection ratio	It is negative as it rejects a large number of qualified applicants to select the most suitable for the jobs.
4.	Recruitment involves searching and identifying human resources	Selection involves comparing the identified human resources for right position.

FSM_Chapter 07.indd 146 1/13/2020 10:15:46 AM