many species of plants and animals growing ever more endangered in the years since 1947.

As a result, India has seen a number of popular movements aimed at protecting the natural environment from at least the 1970s onwards. There have also been numerous attempts at stopping the construction of dams that would displace large numbers of people (with little compensation for the loss of their homes and lands) and cause ecological damage to the surrounding areas. A rise in the environmental consciousness of the general public has also seen an increased emphasis on preserving the habitats of rare and endangered wildlife by designating certain regions as sanctuaries and national parks.

This section documents some of the Indians whose attempts to protect India's wildlife and natural environment have had significant impact on environmentalism in the country.

SALIM MOIZUDDIN ABDUL ALI

1896–1987

