Blazing a trail

Anand returned to India after World War II and settled in Bombay. He wrote several more novels, many of them autobiographical. He was also a man of wide interests; both in London and back home in India, he wrote on a variety of subjects, from cookery to politics to folktales. Alongside writing, he taught at a number of universities, did charitable work and remained personally committed to fighting all forms of social and religious prejudice. Anand was among the first Indians to write novels in English that put caste and class struggle as well as the effects of British imperialism into focus. This helped make people both in India and outside the country aware of the terrible consequences of casteism and colonial oppression. Through his work, his politics and his articulation of what literature should seek to do, he left a lasting impact on modern Indian writing.
