1937. Despite opposition from orthodox men in the region, Rasul was a popular politician who was re-elected several times.

After being elected to public office, Rasul took the then-controversial decision to give up purdah. This practice, followed by both Hindu and Muslim women in north India, forced women to remain sequestered from people outside their families and thus denied many the opportunity to get an education or move freely in society.

