Devadasis were women who were ‘dedicated’ to temples as young girls, to be trained in the arts of music and dance, a centuries-old practice. They sometimes became courtesans who entertained kings and nobles. By the twentieth century, they were not considered respectable, and relegated to the fringes of society.