message of tolerance, charity, and hard work, taught in his "true words," are preserved as scripture in the Guru Granth Sahib of the Sikhs, worshiped in Amritsar's Golden Temple. Mughal emperors brutally murdered two of Sikhism's ten Gurus, who refused to convert to Islam, and Guru Govind Singh, the tenth and last Guru, launched a war to the death against Mughal tyranny, renaming his Sikh (Student) disciples Singhs (Lions), welding them into a mighty Khalsa (Army of the Pure) of fearless sword-wielding warriors pledged in bonds of blood to destroy the Mughal tyrants. The British subsequently recruited Sikhs into their Indian army, and their fighting prowess and spirit continue to be represented in India's armed forces, as well as by national leaders like the current prime minister, Dr. Manmohan Singh. Sikhism today has become a global faith, though most Sikhs still live in India, and all try to visit Amritsar at least once a year.

Partition's bitter "wooden loaf," as Gandhi called it, thus poisoned the taste of freedom for Congress's leaders, all of whom had so eagerly awaited independence. Nehru sorely questioned his own judgment in accepting the partition scheme that Mountbatten had pushed upon him, urging him not to hesitate. "And yet, the consequences of that partition have been so terrible that one is inclined to think that anything else would have been preferable," Nehru sadly reflected after it was too late.[6] The legacy of hatred left by the tragedy of partition induced the leaders of both new dominions to mistrust each other, seek vengeance, and believe the worst of each other's motives. Two months after winning their precious freedom, India and Pakistan embarked on their first war, over the former state of Jammu and Kashmir.
