gesture was to prod Indira Gandhi into urging India's nuclear scientists to work harder to build their own atomic bombs, the first of which would be exploded three years later under Rajasthan's desert.

From China, Bhutto flew to New York, where he talked tough to the UN Security Council in mid-December, vowing that Pakistan would "fight for a thousand years . . . to the last man!" The next morning, the Pakistan army in Dhaka surrendered. "I am not a rat," Bhutto told the council, tearing up the rest of his prepared speech. "Today I am not ratting, but I am leaving your Security Council. I find it disgraceful to my person and my country to remain here a moment longer." Then he and his daughter Benazir rushed out of the council chamber together.

Nixon invited Bhutto to meet with him on Bebe Rebozo's yacht in Key Biscayne the next day. Bhutto was promised full support to save what was left of Pakistan, now that India's treacherous "cow-bitch," as Nixon called Indira Gandhi, and her "puppet Mujib" had "conspired" to steal most of Pakistan's population from Islamabad. Bhutto caught the next Pan Am flight from New York to Rome, where a Pakistan International Airlines plane was waiting to fly him home.

"My dear countrymen," President Bhutto told his defeated people. "We have to pick up the pieces, very small pieces, but we will make a new Pakistan, a prosperous and progressive Pakistan, a Pakistan free of exploitation." He spoke nationwide over Pakistan's radio, in English, saying "the world is listening," knowing that Nixon taped his every word. It was an inspirational speech, much of it suggested to him by Kissinger. Next on his agenda was to meet with Mujib in the West Pakistani prison to which they had taken him from Dhaka on April Fool's Day. Bhutto tried his best to convince Mujib that he was his friend, and that they should now be allies, but Mujib wasn't quite ready for that as yet. He accepted Bhutto's offer to put him on a plane to London, from where he was flown to Delhi by the RAF. In Delhi, Mujib met with Indira Gandhi, and then took an Indian plane home to Dhaka, where he was hailed by millions of jubilant Bengalis as their first prime minister and "father-friend" (bangobandha) of the new nation, Bangladesh.

India's victory over Pakistan in 1971 exalted the status of Indira Gandhi to heights of popularity and power never attained even by her father. Millions of Indians believed her to be nothing less than the mother goddess Durga. Throughout Europe she was admired as a great strategist and brilliant diplomat who had defeated both Pakistan and the
