tens of thousands of Islam's fiercest fighters. Initially, they were Afghan Pathans, but later many came from every Arab country, including the most infamous leaders of Al-Qaeda, Saudi Arabia's Osama bin Laden and his lieutenants. The latter were supported by the CIA as well as Pakistan's Inter-Services Intelligence (ISI) agency, through which Pakistan's army channeled billions of dollars in money and matériel received from Washington. India soon learned that many of Afghanistan's fiercest mujahideen were Muslim terrorists who aimed to do as much damage as they possibly could to Indian Kashmir.

Zia's fundamentalist passions drove him to plan to turn Pakistan into a mullah-run society with Islam's medieval primary system of education, taught in thousands of madrassas, supported by Saudi Arabian money, to house Pakistani boys and young men, who memorized only the Qur'an and learned to use weapons for jihad against Indian and Western infidels. During his eleven years in power, Zia armed and funded those four
