bring his suicide brand of terror to New York and London, and in March 2009, his followers hit Lahore's Police Academy, killing eight of its new recruits and their trainers. But on 5 August 2009, an unmanned U.S. drone aircraft killed Mehsud and his wife in southern Waziristan.

In September 2008, President Zardari flew to New York to meet with Prime Minister Manmohan Singh at the opening session of the United Nations. They vowed to repair "bridges of friendship" between India and Pakistan and to carry forward the "dialogue peace process" launched in 2004. After that cordial greeting they issued a joint statement, wisely insisting that "hostility and terrorism have no place in the vision they share of the bilateral relationship and . . . severe action would be taken against any elements directing or involved in terrorist acts."[2] They agreed to open the Line of Control in Kashmir to Indo- Pakistani trade starting on 21 October 2008. This New York summit proved so hopeful that some believed it might lead to an early and enduring resolution of all outstanding Indo-Pakistani conflicts, including Kashmir.

On 26 November 2008, however, ten Pakistani terrorists, who had left Karachi by sea, launched three days and nights of suicidal murders in Mumbai, killing at least 173, among them several Jews and Parsis, though most were Hindus. Thanks to India's patient restraint, this despicable attack on its richest city did not escalate into nuclear war, though Pakistan continued to drag its heels with regard to India's demand that it punish the Lashkar terrorist leaders appropriately. Moreover, President Zardari's civil government and General Kayani's army failed lamentably to protect foreign visitors as vital to Pakistan's global status and economy as Sri Lanka's cricket team, whose bus was attacked by twelve motorcycle terrorists on 3 March 2009 in the heart of Lahore, which had been stripped of police despite ample notice of the cricket team's imminent arrival there and solemn promises of protection. Small wonder that no foreign team plans in the foreseeable future to visit Pakistan, which has long prided itself on its cricket diplomacy, as Musharraf called a recent visit by Pakistan's team to Agra in India, where he accompanied them. What must it take for Pakistan's leaders to awaken to the importance of cleansing their own cities of terrorists and inculcating civilized values, which start with the sanctity of life and include proper protection of one's neighbors and guests as well as Pakistan's own citizens?

Pakistan's president had also still to learn that political opponents should never be banned from contesting elections, but can only be beaten
