police from the Vale of Kashmir. India might insist on keeping a token force for several more years in Srinagar itself, but Kashmiris should be trained to maintain their own security, and the establishment of a joint Indo-Pakistani-Kashmiri team of special troops could be established to implement such training, written into the Peace Treaty in its final form. The drawing down of troops might take a bit longer, depending on how well the initial phase progressed, but considering the length of the Kashmir conflict, that would hardly be surprising.

Bilateral Indo-Pakistani agreements specifying greater cooperation economically, educationally, and culturally between New Delhi and Islamabad would also be required as part of this permanent peace process. Kashmiri Hurriyat, Jammu Hindu, and Ladakhi Buddhist leaders should be elected to serve on each of these joint Indo-Pakistani Commissions, contributing their vital local knowledge and vision in all such cooperative areas from the start of the process. The headquarters of each Kashmir peace subcommission could be based permanently in Srinagar, New Delhi, Islamabad, and Muzaffarabad. The permanent secretariat of the SAARC in Kathmandu should support the Kashmir peace process in every possible way, and the UN Security Council should also be part of this international process of constant cooperation and monitoring assistance.

The importance of bolstering Pakistan's economy and strengthening its educational institutions need hardly be elaborated upon, but here again the process of institution-building will prove slow, arduous, and obviously expensive, though in the long run relatively reasonable compared to the cost of continuing the conflict and the threat of nuclear war. The current U.S. commitment of $1.5 billion a year for five years to help Pakistan strengthen its educational system is but a first step in this sensible direction of global support to the peace-building process in South Asia. Arms alone, no matter how modern or powerfully remote, will never solve problems deeply buried in the hearts and minds of hundreds of millions of people. Nor will education alone do the complex job of rebuilding lives and opening minds. Yet with the prospect of productive, challenging, and peaceful jobs at the end of the educational process, Pakistan's citizens will surely soon learn to reject violence and communal hatred, recognizing instead the values and beauty of leading fruitful, peaceful lives.

The creation of a nationwide "Pakistan Quaid [Great Leader] Service Corps," modeled on our AmeriCorps, could help reeducate enough