young Pakistanis to accelerate the process of change required to transform Pakistan from its current state of sectarian religious preoccupation to a more secular modernity. Most Pakistanis continue to admire their Quaid-i-Azam Jinnah, but few realize how secular, liberal, and judicious a man he actually was. The new Service Corps would, therefore, include the reeducation of its volunteers in their own history as well as courses on social welfare, public health, economic development, urban planning, and global cooperation. Each young volunteer could sign on initially for one year, with the option of renewing the contract. My hope is that in the first five years, many thousands of Pakistan's potentially best and brightest future leaders would be enrolled in this Quaid Service Corps.

Some Americans, sickened by the murder and mayhem daily reported from Pakistan, believe that all U.S. aid to Pakistan should cease. Many Indians are similarly inclined to believe that the recent plague of terror unleashed by Pakistani extremists puts their entire population beyond rational reach, deserving neither assistance nor compassion. Yet more than 160 million moderate Pakistani Muslims would thus be left to the destructive domination and lack of mercy of at most a few million Taliban and Al-Qaeda terrorists and their sympathizers living along Pakistan's frontier. The result of so unconscionable a policy is too perilous to contemplate. Our world is so tightly linked today that no nation, indeed no island, can long remain isolated, unaffected by or unaffecting all of us. If Pakistan should ever succumb to the madness of its Taliban terrorist minority, or to the allure of Al-Qaeda's extremist form of jihad, all of South Asia might then become victims of that same deadly disease, capable even of spreading globally. For the world to abandon Pakistan today could mean finding ourselves forced to fight nuclear-armed Taliban and Al-Qaeda suicide bombers in the future. That would be tantamount to abandoning civilization as we know it.

"The only thing we have to fear is fear itself," President Franklin D. Roosevelt taught us in March 1933, in his first inaugural address. Taliban bombers have now proved to be their own worst enemies, forcing most Pakistanis to recognize how vital the need to confront and defeat such terrorists is to the very survival of their nation. No alternative exists. In April 2009, two months after the government of Pakistan had surrendered to Taliban demands to give Islam's medieval Sharia law free reign in the Swat Valley, Taliban killers moved into neighboring Buner District to its south, swiftly taking over there as well. Local police were too weak to stop these ideologically motivated, well-armed zealots from
