closing down every female school and music shop in the district, just seventy miles north of Islamabad itself. Pakistan's army was finally sent down from Peshawar to deal with this fast-moving rebellion aimed at the heart of Pakistan's capital. The army has always been Pakistan's strongest institution, its final arbiter at setting the limits "on what is possible in Pakistan."[9] Without its army to protect and defend Pakistanis themselves from the multifaceted threat now posed by Taliban insurgents, nuclear-armed Pakistan would pose, as Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton rightly put it to Congress, "a mortal threat to the security and safety of our country and the world."[10]

On 7 July 2009, President Zardari admitted that Pakistani "militants and extremists" had been "created and nurtured" by Pakistani military trainers for "attacks launched in India" prior to 11 September 2001. It was the first such high-level admission from Islamabad that the charges India's Foreign Ministry had been making for years were true. "India's stand has been vindicated," Foreign Minister S.M. Krishna responded, but now Pakistan must "take action" against those "conspiracies and conspirators."[11] That same day in July, the U.S. Treasury froze all the assets of four Pakistani "terrorists" linked both to Lashkar-e-Tayiba and Al-Qaeda, one of them with connections to Karachi's underworld don Dawood Ibrahim, in planning the Mumbai commuter train bombings of July 2006.[12] Those four newly designated "global terrorists" from Pakistan's Lashkar-e-Tayiba were Arif Qasmani, chief coordinator of the 2008 Mumbai terrorist attack; Fazeel-Ameen al-Peshawari, who provided funds and recruits to Al-Qaeda; Yahya Mujahid, head of the Lashkar's media department since 2001; and Nasir Javaid, commander of the Lashkar's operations and training center in Pakistan. The Muslim mullah who launched the Lashkar in 1989 to train Pakistani terrorists sent across the Line of Control into India, Hafiz M. Saeed, was initially placed under house arrest in Pakistan soon after the 2008 Mumbai attacks had ended, but a few months later was released by order of Pakistan's High Court of Lahore, which insisted that there was "insufficient evidence" to hold him. Nonetheless, the Pakistani authorities handed over their intelligence file on the Lashkar's terrorist funding and training to India's government in mid-July 2009. Pakistan is finally preparing to try five Lashkar operatives recently arrested in Karachi for planning the Mumbai attack, including its "mastermind," Zaki-ur-Rehman Lakhvi, who issued cell-phone orders to his killers in