Mumbai from his base in Karachi, reminding them that they "must not be taken alive."

On 20 July 2009, the only Pakistani terrorist invader of Mumbai taken alive, Ajmal Amir Kasab, startled the High Court in which he was being tried for murder by confessing "to all my crimes."[13] Kasab had not even told his lawyer of his intention to confess. He then informed Judge M. L. Tahiliyani that he and his fellow Lashkar terrorists had all been "trained" for a month and a half in a "safe house" in Karachi before setting sail for Mumbai.

After landing in Mumbai, Kasab and his partner, Abu Ismail, attacked the central railway terminal, firing their automatic rifles indiscriminately and hurling their hand grenades, killing 52 people and wounding 109 more. They then moved on to wreak havoc at Cama Hospital. Kasab named four Lashkar "persons" who had prepared the terrorist team of ten for their hideous job, seeing them off at Karachi's port: "Zaki-ur Rehman Lakhvi, Abu Hamza, Abu Kafa, and Abu Jundala."[14] Little more than one year after his trial had begun, Kasab was found guilty of "waging war against India," and on 8 May 2010 he was sentenced to death by hanging.

Pakistan's imminent trials of its Lashkar leaders, charged with planning and funding the brutal attacks in Mumbai and against India's embassy in Kabul, where 54 Indians and Afghan employees were killed earlier, should be open to India's press and transparent in procedure, providing the "visible response" to Pakistani terrorist actions that New Delhi has long demanded. As India's Foreign Secretary Shivshankar Menon told his Pakistani counterpart, Salman Bashir, during their mid-July 2009 Non-Aligned Movement (NAM) meeting at Sharm-el-Sheikh: "Pakistan should give us an undertaking that they will not let their soil be used for terrorist activities directed against India."[15] The next day, Pakistan's Prime Minister Gilani personally promised India's Prime Minister Singh that Islamabad was ready to cooperate fully with India in ending future terrorist attacks designed to provoke hatred and incite possible war with India. If Pakistan's civil leadership has the strength and courage firmly to enforce Gilani's promise, then India's wisdom in resisting all demands from its own militants to respond more forcefully to the Mumbai attack will have been fully vindicated. Such brave cooperation in tackling terrorist provocations and rejecting violent retaliatory responses is the most encouraging step by India and Pakistan on the high road to peace for South Asia. Just one day after that summit