strengthening of Prime Minister Shastri's position. Raborn also agreed that India might continue to postpone a decision on nuclear weapons for the time being in return for continued high-level US economic aid, a renewal of military assistance and less US pressure on the Kashmir issue. The US spymaster, however, did not believe that such conditions would result in India holding on to its nonnuclear policy indefinitely. So, he warned the US government that within the next few years, New Delhi would probably detonate a nuclear device and proceed to produce nuclear weapons.

The formation of R&AW in 1968 and its subsequent role in creating Bangladesh pushed the US to intensify its activities in India. The US National Security Advisor, Henry A. Kissinger advised the US government to stop sending all military supplies to India and suspend critical military programmes including a communication system for a defensive radar directed at China and spares for about sixty-two C-119s that formed a large portion of India's transport fleet. In an analysis, US intelligence said that the IB working under the home ministry was gathering incriminating information about Chinese activities and turning it over to the appropriate state or national agencies. It further stated that IB's fingerprint bureau and forensic science laboratory was superior to those maintained by other organisations. Another US report stated:

The threat from China has spurred the central government into creating several small specialized security forces for duty in the sensitive areas along the Sino-India border. The Directorate General of Security (DGS), an office that is formally part of the Cabinet Secretariat but apparently has direct access to the Prime Minister, commands three loosely related forces and an air arm: the Special Frontier Force, the Indo-Tibetan Border
