It seemed as if with every new acquisition that TGBL made, Ratan's appetite only grew. He planned to more than triple the company's revenue in five years: 'The present revenue of the company is USD 1.5 billion. The target is to take it to USD five billion in the next five years,' he said. He also reiterated his plan for the company to 'foray into foods and health drink segments as well'.

Krishna Kumar elaborated that with 'over 65 % of the consolidated revenues' coming from 'markets outside India', TGBL would look at every opportunity to expand the company's business. Besides strengthening its presence in the 'current stronghold markets through the exploitation of great new tea and coffee products', he revealed a larger plan. He said that the company would move into 'new channels, capturing greater share in those parts of the market where there is growth, addressing new need states and new consumer segments'.

TGBL soon got to work, signing an MoU with PepsiCo to establish a JV to deliver 'non-carbonated ready-to-drink beverages, focused on health and enhanced wellness'. It also increased its stake in Mount Everest Mineral Water to 40.92 per cent. Ratan called these developments a 'significant change' that accentuated the company's plan to meet not only the market in India for tea and 'ready-to-drink products', but to also be in the business of other beverages like 'vitaminised water-based products'.

In the announcement he made at the 2010 AGM, Ratan underscored the company's commitment to social welfare. He said that while its vision was to invest in new brands and products, the goal would be to 'stay away' from products which would be 'unhealthy to people's health and wellness and injurious to health'. TGBL wanted to deal in products that would promote 'wellness and good health'. 'With this the Company will be a global player in a worthwhile segment in the market place with new products and new technologies, both in India and abroad and the Company will look forward to a great future,' Ratan said.

The following year, TGBL's JV with PepsiCo—NourishCo Beverages—launched its first fully developed energy drink, Tata Gluco+. It signed an MoU to forge an equal-stake JV with Kerala Ayurveda Limited for developing a variety of beverages and 'food products based on proven Ayurvedic recipes'. It increased its shareholding in Joekels Tea Packers, the third-largest tea business in South Africa in which it had acquired a 33 per cent stake in 2006, to become its majority owner.
